Dear Utica Common Council Members and Mayor Palmieri,

We are writing regarding Utica’s nuisance ordinance, known as “Public Nuisance Abatement” and found in Chapter 2-17, Article I of Utica’s municipal code. Nuisance ordinances, such as this one, infringe on residents’ constitutional right to petition the government because they punish calls for police assistance. Furthermore, such ordinances harm domestic violence and other crime victims who may be punished under the ordinance for crimes committed against them.

We wish to call your attention to a recent court case from the Appellate Division of the Third Department where an ordinance that is very similar to the Utica nuisance ordinance was struck down as unconstitutional. We believe that your nuisance ordinance is also unlawful and we hope that this recent decision will prompt Utica to rescind its Public Nuisance Abatement ordinance. In this letter we (1) explain why the Utica ordinance is unconstitutional under the First Amendment, under the recent Third Department decision; (2) discuss how the Utica ordinance also may run afoul of the Constitution’s Equal Protection and Due Process clauses, as well as the Fair Housing Act; and (3) set forth a request for limited records related to the ordinance pursuant to New York State Freedom of Information Law, N.Y. Pub. Off. Law § 84 et seq.

The Utica “Public Nuisance Abatement” Ordinance is Unconstitutional

In a June 2017 decision, Village of Groton v. Pirro, the Third Judicial Department’s Appellate Division struck down the Village of Groton’s Nuisance Law as unconstitutional.1 The Nuisance Law penalized properties for criminal activity, even when tenants reported the criminal activity or were the victims of it.

The First Amendment protects the right to petition the government for redress of grievances, including the right to make criminal complaints to the police. The court in Village of Groton found that the Nuisance Law was unconstitutional under the First Amendment because it “deters tenants from seeking assistance from police by placing them at risk of losing their homes.” The court struck down the entire law on its face because it would chill people, including domestic violence victims, from reaching out for police assistance. It noted that “the unconstitutional aspects of the law are so interwoven in its provisions that severance would be impractical,” concluding that the entire law was invalid under the First Amendment.

Utica’s ordinance, like the law struck down in Village of Groton, violates the First Amendment’s protection of the right to petition the government because it authorizes the imposition of penalties based on criminal activity or other offenses, which generally come to the attention of Utica through 911 calls and police reports. Like the unconstitutional Village of Groton ordinance, the Utica ordinance contains the following provisions:

- The Utica ordinance punishes landlords and tenants for a wide range of behaviors – criminal and noncriminal – that any person engages in on a property. The ordinance is triggered by police response to a broad list of conduct, including all criminal activities. This is similar to the unconstitutional Village of Groton law, under which points accumulated toward a public nuisance determination based on a comprehensive list of criminal and non-criminal incidents, ranging from “[s]uffering or permitting the premises to become disorderly” to assault.

- The Utica ordinance does not require convictions in order for the ordinance to be triggered. Instead, arrests, accusatory instruments, search warrants, and other activities can serve as prima facie evidence of a public nuisance. Similarly, under the invalid Groton nuisance ordinance, violations that accrued points did not need to involve criminal prosecution or conviction, and merely had to be proven by a preponderance of the evidence.

- The Utica ordinance permits the city to base civil actions and administrative remedies on evidence of police responses to properties. While the ordinance lists activities, such as arrests and service of accusatory instruments, that constitute prima facie evidence of a public nuisance, it does not restrict the use of calls to the police as evidence of a public nuisance. Thus, like the ordinance at issue in Village of Groton, nothing in the law precludes the ordinance from being triggered for “police involvement resulting from a tenant’s exercise of the right to petition the government for redress by summoning police.”

Like the Groton ordinance, the Utica ordinance makes no distinction between crimes committed by tenants and crimes committed against tenants.10

Both the Utica ordinance and the invalidated Groton ordinance may cause tenants to lose their homes. The Utica ordinance permits the city to suspend or revoke a property’s certificate of occupancy or to order it closed and vacated if it is determined to be a public nuisance.11 The Groton ordinance permitted eviction of tenants as a remedy that landlords could use when a property was designated a nuisance.12

Additionally, Utica’s ordinance raises concerns under the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection Clause and Due Process Clause, and the Fair Housing Act. Under both the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection Clause and the Fair Housing Act, laws may not discriminate on the basis of sex. In September 2016, the Department of Housing and Urban Development issued guidance making clear that nuisance ordinances that have an unjustified discriminatory effect on victims of domestic violence violate the Fair Housing Act.13 This guidance explains that where nuisance ordinances have a disparate impact cities face a “difficult burden” in justifying their use and that repealing nuisance ordinances is “[o]ne step a local government may take toward meeting its duty to affirmatively further fair housing.”14 Laws such as Utica’s that may punish domestic violence victims, who are predominantly women, for seeking police assistance or for being the victims of crime in their homes may unlawfully discriminate on the basis of sex.15 Laws such as Utica’s that permit displacement of tenants pursuant to a nuisance designation without providing adequate procedural protections, including an opportunity for tenants to contest the purported nuisance activity, may violate the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause.

Though these issues were not reached in the Village of Groton decision, similar claims against comparable nuisance ordinances have led to settlements involving significant monetary compensation. The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) filed and settled cases on behalf of domestic violence victims in Borough of Norristown, PA for $495,000, and Surprise, AZ for over $200,000, and both settlements also led to complete repeal of the laws, with an agreement not to adopt similar provisions in the future.16

15 Utica’s ordinance explicitly lists assault and harassment as some of the criminal activities that could trigger the ordinance. City of Utica, N.Y., Code § 2-17-1(10).
Recent lawsuits also have resulted in agreements or court orders to stop enforcement of laws similar to your nuisance ordinance that threaten to displace tenants. In July 2017, tenants with criminal records in transitional supportive housing represented by the ACLU obtained a preliminary injunction from a federal court against a Residential Rental Property Ordinance in Hesperia, California. The Hesperia ordinance, like the ordinance in Utica, allowed the city to take actions that could result in tenants losing their homes based on supposed criminal activity on the property without adequate due process.\(^\text{17}\) In 2016, Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania agreed to stop enforcing an ordinance that allowed city officials to evict tenants and prevent landlords from renting properties if anyone was suspected of illegal activity involving drugs or guns on the premises, after the ACLU filed a lawsuit on behalf of tenants and landlords threatened with eviction under the ordinance.\(^\text{18}\)

Cities in New York also have settled constitutional and Fair Housing Act challenges against their nuisance ordinances. In 2010, a lawsuit brought by domestic violence survivors against East Rochester, New York was settled for monetary damages and resulted in the municipality agreeing to amend its ordinance.\(^\text{19}\) Hornell, New York also settled a challenge brought against its nuisance ordinance by a domestic violence survivor, amending its law in 2011.\(^\text{20}\)

Given the Village of Groton decision, the Utica Public Nuisance Abatement ordinance is clearly unconstitutional. We therefore ask that Utica rescind this ordinance.

Freedom of Information Law Request Regarding Utica’s “Public Nuisance Abatement” Ordinance

In addition, we request records regarding the ordinance entitled “Public Nuisance Abatement” and found in Chapter 2-17, Article I of Utica’s Municipal Code. Below we have detailed the information we seek for inspection or production in accordance with the New York State Freedom of Information Law, N.Y. Pub. Off. Law § 84 et seq.

If possible, please provide the requested records in electronic format. If requested records are maintained in a computer database, please contact us before retrieving the records so that we can ensure that the retrieved records are in a usable and readable format. We agree to compensate you for the cost of duplicating the records we request, as provided by law. Upon locating the requested documents, please contact us prior to photocopying and advise us of the actual cost of duplication.

The New York State Freedom of Information Law requires a response within five business days of the receipt of a written request for records. If access to the records we are requesting will take longer than five days, please contact us with information about when we might expect copies or the ability to inspect the requested records.

We seek the following records in possession of the City of Utica:

From November 1, 2012 to the present, copies of all warnings, notices, orders, penalties, fines, or other communications issued pursuant to the Public Nuisance Abatement ordinance by any city official or employee.

Please furnish records to:
